

You can often arrange for a gift to reach someone without showing them who sent it. The seller may still require your name and payment information, and whether the delivery stays anonymous depends on its rules and what is included.

What the recipient can see

An anonymous delivery generally keeps your name off the gift card, packing slip, and delivery label. It does not mean the seller or delivery service has no record of your identity.

Flowers might come with a message card or instructions for caring for them. Before placing an order, find out exactly what will accompany the arrangement and make sure those items will not identify you. For a boxed present, ask what return address appears and whether any documents will be packed inside.

Steps to keep your name private

1. Find out if the seller can deliver anonymously, and ask what details the recipient will be able to see.
2. Give the seller the recipient’s name and address, along with any instructions needed to complete the delivery.
3. Either leave the message field empty or write something that does not disclose who you are.
4. Review the order details carefully. Check the message, billing information, and delivery instructions for your name.
5. Ask the seller to verify that your name will not appear on the card, label, or documents included with the gift.

Save your order confirmation in case something goes wrong with delivery. The seller may need your contact information to sort out a problem, even if the recipient never receives it.

Clues that could identify you

Even without a name, other details may give you away. The return address, a phrase the recipient recognizes, or a personal reference in your note could point to you. The date the gift arrives or the kind of gift you chose may also make your identity easier to guess.

Ask what happens if the delivery cannot be completed. If the address is missing information or the recipient is not available, the driver may need to contact someone. Check in advance how labels and delivery updates are handled instead of assuming they will conceal your details.

Consider how the gift may feel

A surprise from an unknown sender may delight someone, but it could also unsettle them. Take particular care if the person has asked not to be contacted or might feel worried by a delivery with no clear sender.

If you are uncertain, you could include enough explanation to help the recipient feel at ease, or decide not to send the gift. Do not write anything that implies you are keeping track of the person or know private details they have not chosen to share.

Common questions about private deliveries

Could the recipient find out who sent it?

They may ask the seller, but what the seller can share depends on its privacy policy and the situation. Ask about this before ordering; do not count on your identity staying confidential in every case.

Is it possible to send flowers with no note?

Many sellers allow you to leave out a personal message, though the available choices differ. Confirm whether the flowers will still arrive with a blank card or some other note.
