

How Probate Works in Nebraska and How an Omaha Law Firm Helps Most Nebraska estates move through probate in four broad stages: opening the case, notifying creditors, gathering and paying what is owed, and distributing what remains. Probate is the county court process that confirms who has authority over a deceased person's property, and an attorney helps the personal representative complete each stage correctly and on time. The first stage starts with a filing in the county court Law Firm where the person lived, which for many local families means the county court in Douglas County in downtown Omaha, or the Sarpy County court for residents of Papillion, La Vista, and Bellevue. Nebraska follows a version of the Uniform Probate Code, which allows two paths. Informal probate is handled largely through paperwork reviewed by a court registrar and works well when the will is clear and family members agree. Formal probate goes before a judge and is used when there is a dispute, a question about the will, or another reason the court needs to rule. Either way, the court appoints a personal representative, often the person named as executor in the will. Once appointed, the personal representative publishes notice to creditors, which gives them a limited period to present claims, and sends notice to known creditors and heirs. The representative then inventories assets, collects money owed to the estate, pays valid bills and taxes, and keeps careful records. Nebraska also has a county inheritance tax that must be addressed before the estate can close, with rates tied to how closely each beneficiary was related to the person who died. Only after those steps does the representative distribute property to heirs under the will or, top law firm if there is no will, under Nebraska's intestate succession rules.
