Questions and Answers

Q1: What gauge should I choose for home defense? A: Twelve-gauge is the most common for defensive use due to load variety and availability. If recoil is a concern, a quality 20-gauge with appropriate defensive loads is a strong alternative. Try both at a range before deciding.

Q2: Should I pick a pump-action or a semi-automatic shotgun? A: Pumps are simple, durable, and budget-friendly. Semi-autos can offer faster follow-up shots and softer recoil but may cost more. Handle both at local gun retailers and consider your training time and ammo preferences.

Q3: Do I need a weapon light on a home-defense shotgun? A: While not mandatory, a reliable light helps with target identification in low light. Many Fort Walton Beach gun shops can recommend compatible mounts and options.

Q4: How do I make sure I pick the right model from the gun store inventory? A: Shoulder several models, check ergonomics, ask about common reliability feedback, and confirm availability of defensive ammunition and accessories. Review any current promotions or rebates to maximize value.

Q5: Are AR-15 Florida options relevant if I'm focused on a shotgun? A: They serve different roles. An AR-15 can complement a shotgun for training or outdoor use. For primary home defense, many still prefer the simplicity and versatility of a shotgun, especially when starting out.
