Following the secession of countless Southern states from the Union, those states shaped the Confederate States of America. Their initial flag became often called the "Stars and Bars," characterised with the aid of three horizontal stripes—two crimson and one white—with a blue canton offering stars representing each kingdom. This layout was intended to symbolize solidarity most of the Confederacy.

However, as battles raged on and extra infantrymen took to the fields, confusion arose between this flag and the Union's Stars and Stripes on the battlefield. To handle this aspect, General P.G.T. Beauregard proposed a brand new layout in 1863—the "Southern Cross." This edition featured a blue saltire (diagonal move) with white stars on a pink heritage. It become widely acknowledged as a battle flag for a lot of Confederate armies.
